ABOUT SEMINAR

In today's world, external pressure and advances in adjacent technology areas are creating the need to reassess classical unit operations and look for more efficient solutions for the process industries. Process Intensification presents one of the most significant developments in chemical and process engineering of the past decennia. It attracts more and more attention of the chemical engineering community.

This Seminar aims to discuss how chemical processing plants can become substantially smaller, simpler, more controllable, more selective and more energy-efficient, addresses the fundamental sustainability issues in process industry and presents the core element of Green Chemical Engineering. This can be achieved by plant, facility, and introduction of alternate efficient process, all of which allows for decrease in consumption of raw material, energy use, process time and waste. Additionally, these advancements are expected to help in reduction of more than 50-70% pollution, energy use, capital and operating costs compared to current processes and equipment.

It has now become imperative for researchers, educators, students, scientists, engineers and industrialists to communicate and discuss research developments by exchanging their ideas. The main spirit of this seminar is to impart knowledge in a comprehensive way.
